A NOTE FROM THE DIRECTOR...

What does theater really contribute to our community? I've heard this asked on occasion, never in a mean way. Just an honest question. People often try to look at the output of theater - the money, the tickets, the tourism - as a means of success. Those certainly aren't bad things to look at, and they can be the result of good theater. In truth, though, it's the input - what it gives us - that makes it a success. So what's the most important thing theater contributes?

The people, of course. Theater invests in the lives of everyone it touches - from cast and crew to audience. It brings us together in a unique, special way.

It was this spirit of community that drew me into directing The Music Man for WWOB. I was excited to see others enjoy the sense of friendship and teamwork my wife and I got to experience performing the show years prior.

WWOB has always strived for excellence on stage, and we want to bring the audience something in every show that they've never seen before. From special effects to fly rigs and more, we want audiences to leave wow'd. In this show, the "special effect" is the ensemble becoming entire community of interesting, quirky, funny people and really, it's no effect. These people have generously donated their time and talent and have grown to become a community of their own. It is their genuine love for each other and this show that shines on stage - I couldn't be prouder.

The best part of community theater is the word "community." A lot of places do theater, but few places do community. Just like the characters in The Music Man, the WWOB community has a lot of personality, with some good days, some frustrating days, and everything in between. But for anyone engaging in the WWOB community, the main goal is always the same: "people are more important than plays." For me, The Music Man is our tribute to the very community WWOB has hoped to cultivate these last few years. Just as the people of River City Iowa learn that it's not the music that makes them united, but rather the spirit of community, so we too remember what is most important in our community. We remember what it is that theater teaches our community, a lesson that can't be found in a textbook...

People are more important than plays. Music is the melody of our memories. So love people, make lots of music, and always find the harmony in every part of life.

Kyle Bullock, Director
